A TEACHER PAR EXCELLENCE

Richard Phillips Feynman was born on May 11 1918 in Manhattan USA. His parents were major influences in his life. His father encouraged him to push the limits so far as science was concerned and his mother taught him to be compassionate. He won the Nobel Prize in Physics in 1965 with Julian and Shintiro Tomonaga for their development of quantum electrodynamics (QED), a theory describing the interaction of charged subatomic particles within electric and magnetic fields. Feynman is best known for his invention of Feynman diagrams, which illustrate the interaction between charged particles by the exchange of virtual photons. To consider Feynman simply as one of the greatest physicists of this century would mean undermining his true achievements. He was one of the greatest teachers that the 20th century ever produced. His lectures on physics have inspired generations of students worldwide and continue to do so. They were like well-written essays which had a beginning, middle and the end. His lectures were self-contained and gave his students a mass of information on key areas in physics.

Answer the questions below based on your understanding of the passage above.
